

Engaging with policy makers

I had the privilege not long ago of facilitating a panel of high-level public servants, all with responsibilities for disability services in their respective governments. The panel was remarkably consistent in its messages to researchers, and those messages are captured in a paper recently published in the Canadian Journal of Disability Studies. Also reviewed in the paper is evidence from the literature about the barriers to knowledge translation to policy makers, and specific recommendations for overcoming these barriers.

For access to the full paper, click here.

